

Rolf Brunstad

rolf.brunstad@nhh.no

Rolf Brunstad is a professor of economics at the Norwegian School of Economics. His main research focus has been the welfare economic implications of government policy and his published work includes articles on labour market policy, industrial economics and agricultural policy. In the latter field his main focus has been on the external effects of agriculture on public goods like the amenity benefits of the cultural landscape and food security, and how support to agriculture should be organized to internalize such effects.